Indonesia's sprawling capital is one of the fastest-growing, most chaotic and most exciting places in South East Asia. It is the gateway to a vast, vibrant and varied island nation that's home to dozens of fascinating cultures.

Formerly the colonial capital of the Dutch East Indies – when it was known as Batavia – Jakarta has grown from its original seaport district into a huge modern conurbation of high-rise hotels and apartments, thronged shopping malls and wide, busy avenues.

THE CITY

You can see Jakarta growing and expanding, with new suburbs springing up on its outskirts and new high-rises reaching for the sky in the downtown area. The hub of the modern city is Taman Merdeka (Independence Square), which is dominated by the showy, 132 metre tall National Monument, crowned by a glittering, stylised metal flame. Taman Fatahillah is the epicentre of Kota, the original heart of Dutch Batavia, and still has a sprinkling of picturesque old buildings.

The nearby Glodok district is the heart of Jakarta's substantial Chinese community, and in recent years has also seen gentrification. Sunda Kelapa, the old port, is lined with warehouses dating back to the colonial era and filled with old-fashioned schooners that still carry cargo between Jakarta and the outlying islands. South of the centre, Jalan Jaksa is a colourful thoroughfare, lined with antique and souvenir shops, cheap restaurants, guesthouses and tour agencies.

The lure of Jakarta's bright lights has attracted Indonesian migrants from all over this huge country. As a result, the capital's menu is stupendously varied. Staples such as noodles and nasi goreng (mixed fried rice) are on the menu everywhere, but there's much more to try. Chicken and beef are the most common fowl and meat dishes – Indonesia is predominantly a Muslim country, and pork is a rarity.

Over the last decade Jakarta has become a major shopping destination, with numerous brand new, air-conditioned shopping malls springing up all over the city, in competition with established malls and department stores such as Blok M, while international department store chains such as Sogo, Mark's and Spencer's and Metro have also made an appearance.

Good buys include traditional ikat and batik textiles, traditional and modern wood carvings from Bali and other islands, antique pottery and Dutch colonial antiques (though these are very often faked). Many international sports and leisure wear brands have factories in Jakarta and sports footwear, sports clothing and designer wear are available at good prices.

Taman Anggrek is the city's largest shopping and leisure mall and is part of a huge residential tower complex on the airport toll road, so it is convenient for last-minute shopping before you leave Jakarta. Seven floors of shops sell designer fashions, sportswear, electronic goods, souvenirs, gifts and authentic antiques. It also has an extensive food court. It is a favourite weekend spot for Indonesian families, with an average of 100,000 visitors each weekend.

Blok M is the city's longest established mall and is a popular local rendezvous, with cafés, bars and restaurants along with an extensive array of designer boutiques, drugstores and souvenir stores. There are gift boutiques and arts and craft stores in the lobbies of most of the large international hotels along Jalan Thamrin, as well as international newsstands. Also on Jalan Thamrin is the flagship branch of Sarinah, the Indonesian department store chain – it sells batik clothing, designer wear, sports equipment and leisure goods and is a good place to pick up bargain priced tropical clothing, swimwear and camping equipment.

Jalan Jaksa, the old-fashioned shopping street that is also where most of Jakarta's budget travel facilities are located. It is lined with antique and craft stores, selling Chinese and Indonesian antique pottery, wood carving, textiles, colonial-style furniture and brassware. There is a thriving trade in 'antique' navigational aids such as sextants, ships' compasses and chronometers, all of which, though apparently aged, are in fact newly made in local workshops. Do not be ashamed to haggle determinedly over prices – the initial asking price will always be very much more than the price you finally agree to pay.

Palaza Senayan has a good choice of Indonesian designer boutiques, including Sebastian's, Ghea and Biyan, all of which offer stylish modern evening wear and colourful traditional dresses, suits, jackets, shirts and blouses. The Sogo Seni handicraft centre, with Plaza Senayan's branch of Sogo, has one of the best selections of Indonesian handicrafts.

Public transport

Jakarta has a range of transport options. Buses are operated by a range of private operators and by the state-owned PPD bus company. Mayasari and Patas AC buses are air conditioned. Flat fares are charged and are posted by the entrance door. Three-wheeled, two-seat scooter taxis (bajaj) and bemo minibuses also operate, as do mikrolet or angkot minibuses on fixed routes.

No public transport information websites or telephone numbers available.

Taxi

For the visitor, however, taxis are the most sensible option as all other options are crowded, slow and petty theft is common. The most reliable taxi companies include Silver Bird and Blue Bird. Drivers should carry a rate sheet showing the current fare to most destinations – check the fare before getting into the taxi. More sensibly, ask your hotel or restaurant to call a cab for you. Blue Bird also offers a premium Golden Bird limousine service, which can be booked through your hotel or on the company's web site.
